Nicknames were extra names or additional names given to someone by another, usually alluding to a personal trait or characteristic for which that person was known. A nickname typically mimicked or exaggerated some personal quality or habit and frequently even contradicted it, such as calling a tall man "Shorty". One did not choose a nickname but was given it by others. Such names were often given in jest and applied only to a particular person. Nicknames were not surnames, at least in the original instance, but sometimes did endure as a family name or surname.
